The commandant of the fort was De Contreeour. Exagerated reports of Braddock's force had reached him, and he was hesitating and debating whether to stand fast and defend or evacuate the fort. De Beaujeu, a young captain, offered to take a force and advance to meet the English. To this the commandant assented, and De Beaujeu, then recomptly marched show of fight they made, and with it every gleam of success expired. For them, volley after volley from behind trees and rocks with fatal effect on their right and left, they were solved with mortal panie, the nineteen huddled together in crowds on a marrow road cased to fire, or if they fired it was in the air. They were so paralyzed that they did not, hear the command of their officers, who acted with great bravery, or if they fired it was in the air. At elections in Greece, each candidate has a separate urn, with his ame upon it, and some emblem that will help the liliterate voter to identify it. This urn has at the top a funnel into which the voter thruss is arm, and it is partitioned into two compartments. The voter, if in favor of the candidate deposits a leading of the result of the right compartment, if against him into the left, and no one can see into which place he puts it, although it may be guessed from the twist of his arm. Each voter also deposits a ballot in the urn of each candidate, and this is said to lead to trickery, combinations and intrigues.
